Dogge from Latin Kings with the audience after the show at the release party for UP 16.

Unfortunately the location for the party was too small.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF A RELEASE PARTY

As soon as the latest issue of UP had been sent to the print shop, we sat down and planned the release party. We always try to throw some kind of happening when a new issue is out. It's a chance for us to meet the readers and get feedback. It's not easy though, finding a location willing to take a graffiti-related crowd. On one hand they're risking to get their toilets bombed, on the other hand they'll have to stand up for their rights when police and authorities try to shut down the happening. Just too much fussing and fighting.

This time we were invited to participate at the club Central Yard. We thought this would be great, but we also wanted to do something for those of the readers who is too young to go to a club.

One Sunday every month there's a market for independent record labels and magazines, called Distro, at Kulturhuset (The Cultural House) in central Stockholm. Kulturhuset arranges; books different bands and runs a coffeshop. Everybody is welcome, it's just to grab a table and put up your stuff. UP has participated several times before, and we asked if we could do it again - of course...

This would not be much of a happening but at least a chance to sell some magazines and meet people. So we put up some information on our web page about Distro and that we were going to be there selling the new issue.

But the politician in charge of cultural questions in Stockholm - Birgitta Rydell (liberal) - went nuts, and forbid UP to be at Kulturhuset. Rydell went out to the press and explained that she luckily enough had stopped a "scribble-publicity-stunt" in facilities owned by Stockholm city community. And according to the newspaper Metro, UP was there to show the most efficient way to bomb a subway car.

Any way the party at Central Yard was successful. We showed graffiti slides and DJ Flaite, Prao D, The Latin Kings, Organism 12 and DJ Large performed and played records. We would like to take the opportunity to give thanks to everyone that made the party possible.

Birgitta Rydell has continued her work for better cultural politics in Stockholm.

Short after our release, the company that provides the space for adverts in the subway refused to put up posters for the Norwegian artist Odd Nerdrum which showed a man with erection. Censorship! shouted Birgitta Rydell now ready to protect the freedom of speech.

This piece was ment to be in the last issue of UP. Due to lay-out problems the piece happened to be placed outside the page. But here it is in its full glory: a Kmasa roof-top in Oslo.

How to get published

1. Send in your photos now to:
UP, Box 773, 120 02 Årsta, Sweden

STREET ART

During the last year one has been able to observe more and more attempts to express feelings and ideas in the public space. Writers as well as none writers have been travelling beyond the limits of traditional graffiti, in seek of new ways to communicate.

Hotel and Robob – Leaving the subway

If you have walked the streets of Stockholm during the last year and at some occasion have lifted your view towards the sky, there is a great chance of running into Hotel and Robob. But they also have their own secret places where they paint.

We have been fascinated by Hotel and Robob for many reasons. For one, they have left the subway for painting the streets and roofs of Stockholm instead. Furthermore, both has very significant styles. Hotel has a very organic style, while Robob seem to be more inspired by graphic form and the industrial urban landscape. During the last year, both have experimented with roll-painting and different stencils. But the style is unmistakable theirs.

H: I started to sketch when I went to 2nd grade. I remember when I said to Robob: “My brother knows bubblestyle; he knows the whole alphabet!”

As a kid, Hotel used to hang out with a writer called Letel. Together they explored the styles of swedish masters such as Ziggy and Dizzy.

H: I got my name, Hotel, from a sketch Letel did. I remember the first time that I wrote “Hotel”, it was on my way home from Letel. I wrote with my finger in the dust on a buss.

R: The name Robob has developed through a process. I was sketching a lot of names like Ober, Bob, Rob and so on. It was many B’s, O’s and R’s. In the end I was caught with Robob. I liked the name; the letters have similar shapes, the right typographical style.

They both say that the inspiration does not originate from graffiti, rather from other sources. Robob describes it as a process where he first observe something that looks good. This observation goes through some unaware mindworks and suddenly, while sketching, it will come out as a new idea.

During the last year we have seen several large pieces made by both of them, and they have been rather diffused shaped and made with ordinary paint.

R: It started last summer. I came home from New York, where Revs really impressed me with his pure roll letters on brick walls. Later we rolled roof pieces.

H: We did a lot of roof-tops together before that, then we realised that ordinary paint could be used. From that point we started to roll roof-pieces.

Working with these pieces is almost the same as doing a normal piece, explains Robob, but it is more relaxing to work with paint. The piece is shaped in their minds before they start to paint, and then developed as work progress.

They bring along a few basic colours, and then blend colours when they are at the wall. They are using a tray or they blend the colours on the roller. Hotel dream of doing the same with cans; bring with him a freezer and then blend the cans while he is painting.

These large project pieces that you do with paint seems to take very much time and preparations. Do you think it would be a good idea with more legal walls?

R: I think they are needed right now, since there are so few of us who really spend a lot of time on each individual piece.

H: But it has to be a lot of walls, if not, it is better to just leave it. Otherwise there will be a lot of bombing in the background.

R: It will be like in Fisksjöäng (see UP #16) last summer, the pieces lasted for like three hours. I think more legal walls would increase the quality.

It is unusual that writers in Stockholm work together on larger pieces like they do in for example Copenhagen or New York. It may have something to do with a shortage of legal walls, and many writers have probably cast jealous looks toward Copenhagen. The Danes have a long experience tying their pieces together with a common theme or background.

Hotel and Robob work together in a very interesting way. They say that their cooperation works really well, and they have found a good theme to work on. They try to split work as even as possible, so both will be enriched by it. Despite this, they may not always agree, which leads to compromises. But Robob think that even compromises makes you strive forward.

Why is it so important to work outdoor. Could you not just as well get a atelier?

R: It is fun that people see what we do. Except from the fact that we enjoy the graffiti environment, rather be outdoor than lock yourself up.

H: The place we are painting right now is really cool, you can work undisturbed.

The place which Hotel refers to are some large, hidden walls in Stockholm. Even though they are in a residential area they are literally invisible, at least during the summer, when they are hidden behind bushes.

One problem when you are painting in hidden places, is that no one see what you do. Are you eager to do exhibitions?

H: Definitely not! Every time I do a piece, it is an exhibition time next day. No messing around with formalities. I have thought about even call people up and invite them, but that never happens. Graffiti on a wall is mysterious. If I was a little kid and suddenly came to the place where we work I would be stunned!

A cooperation between Hotel (the character and the landscape) and Robob during the summer of 2000

R: It feels good to leave your tracks on the city. That is why it is great to find walls which will not be buffed.

H: That's why we paint roof-tops, it is a new experience and a new place every time. On top of that it is not buffed right away. A piece in the sky is supernatural. It is the same as painting a train, it is rolling, and therefore alive.

Hotel has tagged a lot in Stockholm during the last years, while Robob's tags just are starting to appear. Tags are very controversial. They are appreciated by very few who are not writers themselves. Despite that there is the same work behind a tag, as there is behind a piece - a writer can fill a whole notepad with "practice" tags in one day - but tags has not received the same acceptance in the society compared to pieces.

R: There is a difference between tagging and bombing. I really want to spot out the places before I put my tag there. A beautiful tag can give you a fantastic feeling. I want to give just as much of myself in a tag as in a piece. But even when people just are bombing it is fun to see what happens. You get the impression that the city is alive. It is like posters, tags are well-prepared creations which can be done fast. Most of the work is already done at home.

The Stuvsta Hall of Fame, part two - the 1990's

This is the sequel to the first article about the Hall of Fame in Stuvsta. In the first part, which was published in UP 16, Mania and Bonus told us about how the Hall of Fame was made and how it was there during the 1980's. In this sequel we have interviewed Irie who began to write graffiti in 1992. Much of his spare time was spent in Stuvsta.

Why did you start to paint?

It was my brother who wrote graffiti. He wrote Direct. He hung out with Seven and Boogie. Later, everyone in high school started to do pieces. I went to the same school as Dope and Noer. When we became friends they took me to Hall of Fame. They had already spent a lot of time there. This was around 1992.

It was not that strange when we started to go to Hall of Fame, more or less everyone who lives in Stuvsta has been there. Every little kid has been down on tracks sometime. We always went there after school. Sometimes I drove my moped there, and locked it to the fence where it was cut open. It's still like that: When we are doing pieces along the tracks, people suddenly come of out nowhere. Sometimes really drunk on their way home from some bar, taking a shortcut.

What inspired you the most in HOP?

A Yez piece, which Cazter did, Track's pieces, a Face piece by Bonus I remember. Other writers who were painting there at that time were Noah, Hook and Nype. Anse also had some pieces there. There were always some writers working when you arrived. Some did not even care to hide when the trains were passing. People had picknick. I think it was more relaxed back in the early 90's than today. Ordinary people did not seem to care either. Joggers who lived in Stuvsta used to cross the tracks there. They used to stop, and check the pieces we made.

Once I heard of some trouble back in '95. Some 10 people had got caught. Two trains came and stopped on each side of the Fame-track and suddenly there were policemen everywhere. The only one who escaped was a guy who wrote Alzo.

In the late 1980's it was mostly the best writers who did pieces in Hall of Fame; was there any prestige to paint there later on?

Not at all! There were a lot of old stuff which were allowed to stay and lot of good new pieces as well, Inane and Rush, Estik and the Södertälje posse and others. We used it as rehearsal place, and went over our pieces all the time. This was the place where we started to paint. It was not until 1997 that all walls were pieced.

Nox pieced a lot, as did Tune, Zame and Zhed. Vien was also there, he and his friend rolled some "Slayer" pieces. The older writers like Bonus and Erse came there. They sketched a lot, but they never finished anything. I think they got fed up. I met Bonus a few times there, and he did not seem happy by seeing so many writers there. "Don't tell them that there is anything new here!" he used to say when he left.

Nowadays there are nobody working there at all, so the colours are peeling of the walls really fast. I have been there and checked out the place for some time, but it is completely dead.

Why do you think that there was more surveillance in the Hall Of Fame?

They probably got fed up with kids running around on the tracks. Also the fact that the Fame has a connection to the Älvsjö yard. We got into the yard through a tunnel, always during day-time on Sundays.

This letter came with some of these photos:

Despite the fact that trams in city of Gothenburg has been tagged since mid-80's, that's nothing compared to today's tagging. During summer Y2000 a new explosion-like wave of tagging spread on the 200 wagons serving the nine lines in Gothenburg. Pieces and throw-ups can roll for months, and with heavy colouring, the bombing has reached dimensions where Göteborgs Spårvägar (transit authority in Gothenburg) has given up the fight and stopped removing tags. Instead they are awaiting surveillance cameras, which are expected to be installed in the trams during spring Y2001.

Here the cities are close to each other: Malmö, Helsingborg, Kristianstad, Trelleborg, Landskrona etc. Less than an hour away with train lies Copenhagen. In the subway tunnels.

Reclaiming the walls

Slogans has always been written on walls and the message is usually more important than the aesthetic form. Tags and pieces are on the contrary about the shape and style of letters and is at the same time publicity for the writer. These two types of graffiti has very little in common and it is different people who make them – or?

In Stockholm pieces like Revolution and Transform Tellus has started to show and in the background of pieces you can read “Stop racism”, “Support the Palestinian uproar” and “save the world”.

It is a handful of writers with relations to the anarchist movement who are responsible for the messages. They are painting both political messages and tags.

– I want to reach ordinary people, that is why I have painted a lot in subway stations, Pixy explains, who together with writers like Poffe, Tiger, Sapfo and Reclaim have united the political and aesthetic graffiti.

Is graffiti an efficient language if you want to reach out with a political message, are people not so fed up with graffiti and have decided that it is ugly.

– People look different on the pieces if they have a political message, Tiger think.

– It is shame if you stay within the frames of graffiti’s, otherwise perhaps the society could easier identify them selves easier with what you are doing. It is a shame that no one except from graffiti writers are painting our city, Pixy says.

Is it important to you what other writers think of what you are doing?

– It is cool if writers like what we are doing, Tiger says.

Do you think more writers should paint political pieces?

– I would not say that writers should paint political. I do it because I want to express things, other may want to express other messages. I think it is political to write your name, says Pixy.

– Graffiti is a way to question the right of property and at the same time say – we do not want to be profitable and passive. To develop the society you must question its rules. But it’s not only about politics, we also paint because it’s fun, Tiger says.

– It is a shame that people are competing within graffiti instead of seeing what could be done together, Pixy says.

Is the competition reasons for graffiti?

– Yes, it is ok to compete with style, but it is a shame if people do not understand what a resisting force they are, says Pixy.

They are opposing the politicians demand for a harder line and no-tolerance which they claim will hit exposed groups like immigrants and homeless and even writers. They work for a society where every one have equal opportunities and think that the capitalistic ideology is a hinder for this.

– No one should make money from exploiting others, says Pixy.

– Many people are not well, but those in charge have no economic interest in ensuring that all are well, says Tiger.

They arrange and participate in different demonstrations and actions against capitalism, no-tolerance, nazism, porno, sexual discrimination etc. The network Reclaim the City is probably most famous through their parties where hundreds of people have blocked streets in inner city and partied. They say that they want a more democratic society, but will not ask permission when they arrange demonstrations.

- We take our democratic rights, says Pixy.

- No one has asked me if I want billboards in the subway, Reclaim points out.

To apply for permission for a demonstration would be to accept the rules of the power game.

- We think the system is wrong, therefore we do not want to ask them for permissions, Sapfo.

The 18th of August they are co-arrangers of the festival "From Alby to Djursholm". They will depart from the suburbs where mostly workers and immigrants live and go to the rich suburb Djursholm to demonstrate against class segregation.

During spring and summer there will be arranged smaller events in Stockholms suburbs, as an intro before 18th of August. To spread the message they use graffiti. They bomb and write the date in the piece.

- Graffiti is a platform in the propaganda, we develop a way to reach out, says Poffe.

- We use all free communication methods available, we set the terms, graffiti is partly about to take what is there and available, Pixy adds.

– Säpos functional description is a joke, it seems as if we are justifying their existence. Now that the Russians no longer is a threat, it is the Antifascistic Action and vegans who are the threat. Without us they would have to close down, says Poffe.

Orne

Bordeaux

In UP 15 we published a page with Orne's pieces from Bordeaux. Shortly thereafter we saw examples of Swedish writers getting influenced by his style.

But Bordeaux of course has more writers than Orne. We asked Taylor from MX-crew to tell us what's going on down there, here's what he said:

"Bordeaux is one of the biggest cities in France. In the southwest, we have a very nice life quality between the Atlantic ocean, forests and Pyrénées mountains.

There are many writers here and the first ones started in the end of the eighties.

I started to do pieces in the beginning of 1991.

I try to go everywhere to combine good styles and quantity. According to me, Graffiti is a good mean to discover other persons, places, towns and countries.

I find my inspiration everywhere: I observe people, trees, ocean, different arts, colours, the different moves and even the rythms of the music, then I improvise.

The name of our crew MX come from the famous french writer and culture minister André Malraux (1901-1976). The cultural neighbourhood of Bordeaux is also called Malraux. It also means we always have an hardcore attitude, in Graffiti or not: "Manganes Xtremes".

Each one in the crew develops a personal style and we always try to be more and more competitive and creative. The MX icludes writers as: Retro, Orne, Rue, Foe, Riot, Supe and many more. Because of the many members MX is seen everywhere in Bordeaux. It's more a mark, a code and a symbol than a real crew - some members don't even know each other."

PRAGUE – NEW IMPRESSIVE STYLES IN EASTERN EUROPE

Prague is the capitol of Czech Republic. The city has 1.2 million inhabitants and is located on the banks of river Vltava (The Moldau). Prague is a European city, which has successfully survived the downfall of east block communism, where tourism has proved one of its major contributors to welfare. Prague is absolutely worth visiting, even for the poor graffiti supporter, the city allows a cheap stay and has an impressive graffiti scene.

City of Prague

Many Prague walls are covered with tags, throw-ups and street pieces. In general, all are black, white and silver, thoroughly made, often with skinny cap.

Authorities in Czech Republic are not spending any considerable resources on graffiti removal. Consequently, graffiti stays on the walls for a long time. This even considering that the city was more bombed some years ago. Many of Prague's inhabitants are fed up with graffiti, which can be seen everywhere, but the police are not prioritizing graffiti either and there are no squads or task forces dedicated to graffiti. The writers therefore continue more or less undisturbed. A new law proposition is now discussed, where graffiti on "historical buildings" is punishable up to eight years.

The writer Cakes, explains that he is participating in discussions with authorities, to find a way to include the graffiti scene in the society; he mainly paints large walls.

History

Graffiti started to surface in Prague in 1989 when communist regime fell in the formerly Republic of Czechoslovakia. Prague was visited by writers from Germany, and was highly inspired by the graffiti scene from Berlin, but also from Dortmund, which is further away.

In the early 90's, there were no books, magazines or movies available in Prague showing American graffiti, nevertheless you see the inspiration from New York, filtered through Berlin, which style is close to New York graffiti. This has probably contributed to the groundbreaking new style of Prague.

The train tracks at Palmovka

Palmovka

Palmovka is Prague's biggest Hall of Fame. Just a few hundred meters from the subway station Palmovka, a railway bridge is crossing the street of Na Zertvacho, some 20 meters up in the air. When you have climbed a steep hill and stand on the top of the bridge, you see hundreds of meters painted wall on both sides of the bridge. Most pieces hold a very high standard and has been done during the last year. Trains run seldom on the two tracks between the walls. The writer Wrach explains that here you can paint during daytime despite being illegal, the train conductors simply don't care. But during last summer the writer Rbk was hit by a train and tragically died. In respect of him, some writers don't paint here any more.

Subways and trains

In 1990 the RCB-crew from Berlin made the first window-down in the subway. During the early 90's there were no rolling pieces, but there was still some writing going on. 1995-1997 there was a shortage of subway railcars and all the pieces were running. On the B-line, every railcar was painted. This attracted writers from other countries. Today it's rare to see a piece in traffic, but a piece can run for weeks or even months. Tags and throw-ups are more frequent.

Vltavska

At the subway station of Vltavska there are many people and much graffiti. This is a key point between trams and subway. On the walls surrounding the station, there are many rapidly drawn pieces and tags, and a few more thoroughly worked pieces. A few hundred meters away, along the river Vltava, are the Hall of Fame, Vltavska.

Samet hip-hop shop & Bar

In the beginning of the 90's there were only poor Czech cans available, but now hip-hop shop Samet has opened. They sell cans, magazines, movies clothes etc.

Inside the shop there is a small bar, where writers gather to drink beer, smoke and play soccer games.

The store is located in the street of Cimburka in the old proletarian area where it is easy to find cheap restaurants, serving a great goulash and knödel.
